With the support of a team which included Peter Lloyd and H.

Adams Carter, Tilman and Noel Odell succeeded in making the first ascent of the 7,816 metres (25,643 ft) mountain, which remained the highest summit climbed by man until 1950. Tilman later described their arrival on the summit:

In The Ascent of Nanda Devi, Tilman is quite preoccupied with the glacier drill that the team geologist Odell has brought along to take ice samples. The seven [tent] poles made up half the load and the other half was something just as unwieldy but rather less necessary, a glacier drill.
