Alfred Mele, Self-Deception and Delusions - PhilPapers
The papers in this volume are drawn from a workshop on delusion and self-deception, held at Macquarie University in November of 2004. Our aim was to bring together theorists working on delusions and self-deception with an eye towards identifying and fostering connections—at both empirical and conceptual levels—between these domains.

1 Delusion and Self-Deception: Mapping the Terrain - CiteSeerX

Considerations about the nature and development of delusions start from a reflection on clinical cases in psychiatry and empirical work in cognitive neuroscience, and inform a broader theoretical understanding of how the mind works, what its limitations are and how perceptual, cognitive and affective states interact.

In this exercise, self-deception is revealed as a demanding notion. There are many ways short of self-deception that motivation may play a role in a subject ' s arriving at a false belief. The cases of delusion that are most clearly examples of self-deception according to Mele ' s account are those in which motivational bias makes a substantial contribution to the second factor in the aetiology of the delusion.
