Paleontology in Florida refers to paleontological research occurring within or conducted by people from the U.S. state of Florida. Florida has a very rich fossil record spanning from the Eocene to recent times. Florida fossils are often very well preserved. The oldest known fossils in Florida date back to the Eocene. At this time Florida was covered in a sea home to a variety of marine invertebrates and the primitive whales Basilosaurus and Pontogenus. During the later Miocene Florida was expos

Fossils have been stored under much of Florida since these megafauna — and many smaller, now extinct species — began to make their homes here some 40 million years ago. Amid various sea levels and ice ages, their bones have been unevenly layered throughout the state, a jumble of time periods found under areas from what is now a residential development in West Palm Beach to an old sand mine in Levy County.

Fortunately, "Florida is a great place to find fossil pearls," Thompson said. Because Florida was underwater for most of its history, marine fossils can be found throughout the state. Most of the well-preserved mollusks and pearls found in Florida are in fossil sites from the Plio-Pleistocene to the Miocene Epoch, dating back about five million to 23 million years ago.
