This suggests that aggression is a consequence of frustration. Frustration always creates a need to respond, and aggression can be one of its outcomes. It implies that frustration may or may not result in aggression, but aggression is possibly a result of frustration. Frustration is not sufficient but rather a necessary condition for aggression.

frustration-aggression hypothesis | Definition ...
Dollard et al. (1939) proposed that if we experience frustration, this leads to aggression. The aggression is a cathartic release of the build-up of frustration. Dollard explains that if the individual is prevented from achieving a goal by some external factor, then this will lead to frustration which will always lead to aggression.

Frustration and aggression.

- APA PsycNET

The frustration aggression theory attempts to explain how and why some people, or groups of people, become violent or aggressive during certain scenarios. The idea is that frustration, when it cannot be displaced or relieved, turns into aggression. This aggression may then turn into violence, resulting in the frustrated person lashing out.

Dealing with Aggression |
SkillsYouNeed

Frustration does not always lead to aggression, particularly when we deliberately suppress it because either we know that it is wrong or we fear the social consequences of being aggressive (eg. losing friendship of target, criticism from others). As a result, we often displace aggression into other activity, such as sports, driving fast and so on.

The frustration-aggression hypothesis states that frustration - defined as the emotion that results from someone being thwarted, blocked or held back in some way - results in aggression. What's more, when the source of the frustration can't be challenged, the theory is that it gets directed towards innocent targets.
