"Although climate change is often framed as a global problem for all of humanity, the heterogeneity of its manifestations, impacts, and responses has to be carefully considered" (Sultana 2014, p. 373). See the AAG resources guide on Geography and Climate Change here. And the Intergovernmental Plan on Climate Change here.

Human-Environment Geography perspectives on Climate Change ...

Empirical evidence suggests that climate change will hit women disproportionately hard. Lack of political power, small economic resources, gender-bound patterns in the division of labour, entrenched cultural patterns and possibly biological differences in heat sensitivity combine to make women and girls particularly vulnerable to extreme weather and other climate-related events.
