Indigenous peoples throughout the world tenaciously defend their lands, cultures, and their lives with resilience and determination. They have done so generation after generation. These are peoples who make up bedrock nations throughout the world in whose territories the United Nations says 80 percent of the world's life sustaining biodiversity remains.

It's not that indigenous peoples suddenly appear as actors situated in state-dominated processes but a reminder that the taxonomy of "indigenous peoples" (or even indigenous "nations") is only an artificial construction formulated by the lingering manifestations of colonial wars of domination, juxtaposed to the much more recent phenomenon of the modern state. Indigenous nations are, after all, communities of people who are rooted to place through great expanses of time.
