It's just before six o'clock on a sunny spring morning in 1798, and Miss Jane Austen wakes to the sound of the dawn chorus of birds surrounding Steventon Rectory. Life is stirring in the village, and in the fields and meadows that lie next to the house, but inside the rectory, Jane is the first out of bed.

In 1798 Jane Austen writes of half past three being the customary dinner hour at Steventon, but by 1808 they are dining at five o'clock in Southampton.

There are many mentions of the timing of dinner in the novels, but none is so explicit as in the fragment The Watsons. Tom Musgrave knows perfectly well that the unpretentious Watson family dine at three, and times his
