Palatability has become as important to petfood formulation as the core ingredients. After all, those ingredients can't provide nutritional benefits if pets won't eat the food or, perhaps more importantly, their owners don't perceive the pets are enjoying the food.

Update: measuring petfood palatability

As consumption of pre-packaged pet food grows, flavor requirements for the food become more important. Originally, pet food palatants were referred to as digests. Digests are proteins that are enzymatically broken down and applied to dry foods to provide the sensory impact of meat. Palatants have grown significantly more sophisticated since the days of digest. Today, palatants are as varied as the pet food brands that rely on their use.
