By Deborah E. Anker, Paul T. Lufkin. International refugee law is undergoing an important transformation, catalyzed by attention to women's issues in general, and the development of new "gender asylum" doctrines and procedures in particular. Here, and in similar developments, the human rights and refugee regimes – the two broad legal systems created by the international community to address human rights abuses – are increasingly likely to find common ground.

Armed conflict harms women, men and children alike. However, it is now widely accepted in the humanitarian community and reflected in international law and policy, that conflict-induced displacement has specific gender dimensions. This means that protection-needs of refugee women and girls often differ significantly from those of men.

This book explores the ambit of the notion of persecution in international law and its relevance in the current geopolitical context, more specifically for refugee women. The work analyses different models for interpreting the notion of persecution in international refugee law through a comparative lens. In particular, a feminist approach to refugee law is adopted to determine to what extent the notion of persecution can apply to gender related forms of violence and what are the challenges ...
